Introduction

For years, the YouTube user Findi TheFunk has been known for uploading obscure 80s funk tracks. Two particular songs, "Cloud Nine" (MP3 labeled as "_cloudnine_1987") and "Machine" (MP3 labeled as "FrenchBoogie machine 1984"), have sparked intrigue within the community due to their unknown origins. Findi himself said he found them on a USB.

Recently, we uncovered substantial evidence that suggests Findi and his friends know the true identity of the artists behind these songs—if not being directly involved themselves. This document presents the findings in a clear and structured manner.

Step 1: Discovery of Raymond Blow

- FMM user Rayzox found a video titled Raymond Blow - Le Roi d'La Piste (1984) Rare French Boogie 45tr (link).

- A vocal isolation comparison between "Machine" and the Raymond Blow song proves that Raymond is very likely the same male singer/rapper on "Machine" (comparison).

- The name "Raymond" matches a lyric in "Machine" where the female vocalist sings: "Raymond, you are so sexy".

- Despite searching, Raymond Blow does not appear on Discogs or any official record archives. The only source of his music is the YouTube channel of "DJ Michel François." (for now…)

Step 2: Suspicious Activity on "DJ Michel François" Channel

- The DJ Michel François account appears to be a fabricated identity.

- Uses a random old man's picture.
- Describes himself as a gardener turned DJ who wants to become best DJ in France
- Uploads strangely titled songs he made like "Joe The Banana."

- Only Raymond Blow songs exist on this channel, with no other trace of Raymond online or in any music databases.

- Findi appears in the comments of DJ Michel François' first video uploaded 3 years ago, and is the only commenter on that video (link).

Step 3: Connections Between Findi and the "Raymond Blow" Circle

- The "Machine" video description by Findi mentions "Raymond." (proof)

- A YouTube user "externalmanager" (Antoine Liquier) commented on both the "Machine" video and Raymond Blow videos. He is the pinned comment on Findi's Machine upload:

- Antoine is Facebook friends with Findi. (proof 1) (proof 2) (proof 3)

- The only other commenter on Raymond Blow videos, Eliott Valion, is also Facebook friends with Findi. (proof 1) (proof 2)

- A playlist titled "Raymond Blow" was created by DJ Michel François channel, containing only 5 videos, 4 Raymond Blow songs and Findi's "Machine" upload (link)

- This links "Machine" directly to the Raymond Blow persona.

Step 4: Findi's Direct Connection to Raymond Blow

- Someone commented 6 months ago on Findi's "Machine" video suggesting Raymond Blow was the singer—Findi ignored it. (proof)
- Findi's original "Cloud Nine" file had FL Studio metadata (proof).
    - Findi claimed it was to "improve quality," but it raises suspicion.
- A song titled "L'Amour Tropical" was uploaded 2 years ago to YouTube as Raymond Blow - L'Amour Tropical (link).
- The same song also appears 2 years ago on SoundCloud account of Findi, labeled as Findi - L'Amour Tropical. (link)
    - This directly links Findi to the Raymond Blow identity.

Conclusion

1. Raymond Blow is not a real artist, this identity seems fabricated (is likely to be Findi).
2. Findi and his friends are directly connected to the "Raymond Blow" persona.
3. "Machine" and "Cloud Nine" were likely created by Findi or someone in his circle.
4. Findi has misled the community by pretending these are "lost" 80s tracks.
5. The female singer on "Machine" is clearly the same as the one on "Cloud Nine," and her distinctive voice and accent make it evident that "Cloud Nine"—despite not featuring Raymond Blow's vocals—is also a hoax, given the similarities in how Findi presented it, including the fabricated USB origin story.